Mission Briefing

An army unit is fighting in the mountains of Afghanistan and is running low on supplies. Due to their low supply situation, they've taken position on a cliff edge to prevent attacks coming from behind them. This helps them focus all their fire in front of them but makes getting supplies to them more difficult because the slightest error puts the supplies over the cliff or in the hands of the enemy.

Game Mechanics

All the knobs are moving back and forth in their row. They are all moving independently at different speeds and the goal is to lock them all in place while they are on the "win" side of the column.

This is a game of observation and timing. To win, all the knobs must be in the win column. If not, then the user will receive a strike for each knob in the loss column.

The faster the player locks them in place, the better their score. Additionally, as time progresses, the smaller the "win" window becomes, thus making it more difficult to get the knobs in the win.

Is it a bus, a street vendor or a tank about to attack? Those are the kinds of questions you'll face as a Geospatial Intelligence analyst. As the eyes of the intelligence community, you'll analyze intelligence imagery from satellites, remotely piloted vehicles and other sources in order to discern the mundane from the dangerous. You'll learn to focus on the details as they are the difference between victory and defeat.
